

Standup 9: Credit Utilization and ANOVA

This week examined credit utilization ratios and their relationship with credit scores. Higher utilization was associated with poorer outcomes, and ANOVA confirmed significant group differences.

However, standard ANOVA assumptions were violated, including normality and homogeneity of variance. This required careful justification for proceeding with the analysis.

Next week, I will document assumption checks and explain why ANOVA remained appropriate given the large sample size.